Ability to show basic information ⬚ Ability to add descriptions to categories ⬚ Easy to use design and large and comprehensive documentation The ModXML project provides a powerful, maintainable, customizable markup language that many web applications can use to describe data. ModXML has been around for a while, and most developers are probably aware of it. Its API is highly functional and can be extended with custom modules that are easily installed in the system. As with any development environment, you can also keep your own web-based database application up to date with the help of a set of command-line tools, known as ModXML CLI. The system requirements for the CLI are limited to the needs of the actual tool: Apache HTTP Server with PHP support and Xdebug installed. Xdebug is a useful and highly flexible feature that allows you to view, debug and test PHP applications within your web browser. This is typically required when developing or testing web applications in any framework or language, so it is suitable for any environment. This project is a standalone PHP application, which means it can be deployed in a production environment without the need of a database-backed web server. It is designed to ease the work on distributed systems: ModXML CLI allows you to submit multiple requests simultaneously, monitoring responses and displaying detailed data on web browser. XML Files XML files are now getting more and more common on websites, especially when the modern web is designed to utilize standards-based text documents. Not only are the files easier to understand when the text is written in a legible fashion, but they are easier to update and reuse than
