Patient-reported health outcomes in community-based residential and outpatient services: a comparison of data quality and practical considerations. This article compares patient-reported outcomes in three groups of residential/outpatient services with different functional capacities: (1) those where clinicians recommended and patients chose to be treated in a community residential/outpatient service setting, (2) those where clinicians recommended a traditional nursing home or hospital and patients chose to be discharged from the service to go home, and (3) those where clinicians recommended home care services but the patients preferred either to stay in the community or to go to a hospital for long-term care. Two different instruments were used to evaluate health outcomes: the Sickness Impact Profile (SIP) and the Older Americans Resource Center Outcomes Scale (OARS). Data for these groups of patients were collected on 75 inpatients in a hospital-based nursing home and 75 outpatients from a geriatric day hospital. Data were also collected on 25 patients who were in a community residential/outpatient service and 19 who were in a home-care agency. Generally, both the SIP and the OARS were able to discriminate between the different groups of services. The SIP showed a wide range of functioning for patients in the community residential/outpatient service and home-care agency. The OARS demonstrated the lowest functioning for patients in the community residential/outpatient service and the highest functioning for patients in the hospital-based service. These findings support the use of the OARS for evaluating outcomes of elderly patients in residential/outpatient services with varying levels of functional capacity.

A few days ago I attended the first book fair for the new academic year at the Faculty of Fine Arts of the Complutense University in Madrid. I found the fair very interesting and it was nice to meet new and old friends. The fair has just begun to flourish with many interesting booksellers,

The prediction of chemical reactivity of phenolic compounds by two new neural networks (QSAR-2). A new type of artificial neural network, QSAR-2, was proposed and tested for the prediction of the electronic and thermodynamic properties of phenolic compounds. A set of compounds with well-defined structures, the ChemAxon Molecular Force Field (MFF), has been used to develop the models. The models were developed in an iterative way by testing and optimizing the structure and topology of the neural networks. The QSAR-2 models developed by the ChemAxon-MFF force field using the Genetic Algorithm (GA) technique gave the best results in most cases. The mean percentage of the training set's compounds that are in the test set's range for a given property (LUMO-energies, apparent molar enthalpy of formation, apparent molar enthalpy of reaction with H₂O₂ and apparent molar enthalpy of reaction with 2,2-diphenyl-1-picrylhydrazyl (DPPH) are, respectively, 25.7, 29.7, 44.5 and 57.1%) is in agreement with those of comparative modeling methods (25.8%, 29.2%, 40.8% and 57.1%). The errors in the generalization ability of the QSAR-2 models developed in this work are relatively small. These models can be useful in studies of chemical processes in which the free energy of activation is of prime importance. QSAR-2 models can also provide insights into the molecular mechanism by which phenolic compounds react with other chemicals, e.g., to understand, for example, why the electron-donating effect of 1d6a3396d6
