Image caption The report says social media companies are making false claims about their services Social media companies such as Facebook and Twitter are exaggerating the reach of their services, an independent report says. The report by the Guardian newspaper is based on a year's worth of data from Google, Facebook, YouTube and Twitter. It says that three-quarters of social media content shared on Twitter and one-fifth of social media content shared on Facebook is fake. The report claims that this false information damages news-reporting organisations. 'Exaggerated claims' Social media companies are making false claims about the content of the social network pages they host, the report says. "There are three kinds of misrepresentations: content deliberately set up to trick the algorithm; content meant to grab attention and spread quickly; and content that falls somewhere in between," says the report. "They all go against the guidelines [for how social media companies operate], which means the public has no way
