The point of the evidence from the Lens Cylinder Microscope is that when the eye is looked into with a. In many parts of the world, there is a need for a solid fuel that can be directly injected, as in a diesel engine, or a liquid that can be vaporized in a cylinder or in an auto-thermal engine and that can be burned in a combustion chamber at a high temperature to produce thermal energy. The best known example of a highly emissive material that can be used to efficiently generate thermal energy is aluminum. This material has an appreciable light emission when it is brought to a temperature of about 2400.degree. F. At higher temperatures, most other substances either do not produce light or their light emission is not sufficient to be useful for thermal energy generation. In some prior art attempts to utilize aluminum as a fuel source, pure aluminum particles have been injected into the cylinder of an internal combustion engine. This approach has the disadvantage that the aluminum particles tend to cause uneven burning and block the exhaust ports and the intake ports of the cylinder. Another approach has been to inject a molten mass of aluminum into the cylinder. Although this process has the advantage of avoiding the uneven burning problem, it has the disadvantage that the aluminum used for this process must be obtained in molten form. In many areas of the world, the supply of aluminum in molten form is inconvenient and can be very expensive. Attempts have also been made to use aluminum in a liquid form and inject it into a cylinder or a combustion chamber of an internal combustion engine. However, this approach has the disadvantage that high pressure pumps are necessary to force the liquid fuel into the cylinder. This complicates the fuel injection system, as well as increasing its weight and cost. Moreover, once the aluminum comes in contact with water, it rapidly oxidizes and begins to get. Since gellation of aluminum can be very rapid, this results in an undesirable change in the fuel characteristics, such as a decrease in volume or decrease in the delivery rate and cause undesirable changes in the characteristics of the fuel. These disadvantages can also be compounded by extraneous substances that may be present in the aluminum such as air and moisture, which cause an undesirable reaction. Accordingly, there is a need for a system that can introduce aluminum as a liquid or a solid fuel directly into a combustion chamber of an internal combustion
