These data lend support to the conclusion that alcohol-attributable deaths do not always reflect a higher burden of alcohol-attributable hospitalizations in Brazil. Our results must be interpreted within the context of some limitations. We calculated hospitalization rates on the basis of alcohol-attributable conditions, although they include those in which another drug or other conditions may have also been present. Additionally, even though we used data from a nationally representative hospitalization database, the conditions of the patient may have changed between discharge and death. The mortality data we used were derived from death certificates, which are subject to several limitations, such as poor sensitivity to detect alcohol-attributable deaths. Because of these limitations, our results should be interpreted with caution. Alcohol-related mortality in the States of Brazil has increased in the last decade, especially in the South and Southeast regions. Recently, serious efforts have been made by the Brazilian Ministry of Health to control and treat the problem of alcohol abuse. We have previously shown that the high coverage rates for alcohol treatment are needed for the successful results of the national intervention programs. However, the lack of education, health care, and social policies that target the prevention and control of alcohol abuse remains a critical issue. These policies must be implemented at the national and regional levels, including
