Two new major national organizations are developing consensus criteria defining a disease state they describe as overactive bladder (OAB). The development of these consensus criteria suggests that primary care physicians may have reservations about the validity of this syndrome and may be reluctant to diagnose and treat patients with this diagnosis. For this reason, we studied the opinions of primary care physicians about the importance of OAB in the primary care setting. This was an Internet-based survey administered to a large national primary care physician sample. Physicians were asked to estimate the percentage of patients with various conditions that had this diagnosis, and to rate the importance of OAB in relation to other conditions. Physicians estimated that only 10% of the patient population in their practice had OAB. They also felt it was not important that a diagnosis of OAB be present for the patient to be treated. The diagnosis of OAB is not perceived to be important by primary care physicians. However, the development of national consensus criteria for a diagnosis of OAB may in time lead to change in this view.Plant polyamines: structure and function, sources and metabolism.
