The machinery of cross-link fixation in plant roots. The cross-links have been studied primarily in the glycoprotein and glycopeptide portion of complex carbohydrates that comprise the cell walls of plant roots. Several plant species accumulate a characteristic subset of these polysaccharides that are resistant to alkali, hot water, and enzymes; these compounds are distinguished by unusual, persistent, and mostly nonreducible aldehydes and esters formed by dehydrogenation and decarboxylation of the reducing sugars. The cross-links have many similarities to the interpolysaccharide cross-links formed by the marine and terrestrial polychaete annelids. However, in these animals, the uncoiling of the linear polysaccharides makes these cross-links more susceptible to removal by digestive enzymes, and the residuals are easily released from their polypeptide carrier molecules. In plant roots, however, the cell walls are extremely resistant to hydrolytic enzymes and the ester linkage is resistant even to the alkaline KOH. The cross-linking is irreversible. So far, the enzyme systems involved have not been defined, but laccase is a likely candidate. The polysaccharides involved in cross-linking are not restricted to the cell walls but also accumulate in the endoplasmic reticulum as a stable component of the Ca2(+)-binding proteins. The cross-links can be removed by soaking the tissue in acidic solutions, but very little is known about the fate of the cross-linked polysaccharides. The oxidized material appears to be recycled into the cell wall.Q: How to check if the elements of a list are nonempty lists or just strings I need to write a function that checks if all the elements of a list are either None, integer, string, or a list of string. So far I have: def elements_are_list_or_str(elmts): for elm in elmts: if isinstance(elm, list) or isinstance(elm, set): return True if isinstance(elm, str): return True return False Is this correct?
