Sitting in a European bar with a few of my rugby-loving friends a few years back, we were looking through a French magazine that featured a couple of photos from a rugby match that had just been played between the two countries. There was quite a bit of banter being thrown around, but as we looked closer at the photo of the French vs. Australian Wallaby — a match where our French friends had lost — the most critical aspect of the photo stuck out for me: there was a nosebleed victim in the front row, getting treated with a pair of French safety glasses. It got me thinking: is it too much to ask for spectators at a sporting event to wear the same safety equipment that we on the field have to use? The fact is that most spectators at sporting events are not in the action zone, and are not getting hit or injured. They are behind the safety barriers, and the chances are good that they will be standing around for the entire match. According to a report from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, there are nearly 30,000 non-fatal injuries and 600 fatal injuries in North American sports annually. Of course, there are things that we can do to help put ourselves in a better position, but the reality is that it is quite difficult to protect yourself from every possible scenario. Although we can't think of anything worse than having a team score a winning touchdown and then a bunch of fans go home celebrating, there are two other ways that any sports fan can be seriously injured. The first is when they are struck in the head by a ball that has been accidentally kicked loose during play. The second is when they injure themselves when they accidentally step on a ball that has been kicked in their direction. The good news is that properly designed and implemented spectator barriers can significantly reduce the chances of either of
