To download the product key, you need to open .British Rail Class 303 The British Rail Class 303 is a single-car diesel shunter built by English Electric in 1960, based on the Class 303 built in Czechoslovakia by the Czechoslovakian state railway company (ČSD) and exported to Great Britain in 1956. The British train is a UK Railways Department design numbered D3106. History The ČSD 303 (also known as the ČD 303) was designed and built in Czechoslovakia in 1953. It was the first diesel-electric shunter to be used by British Railways (BR) and its first design, the ČSD 303, was therefore the first diesel shunter the BR bought in the UK. They were used mainly for shunting activities on the East Coast of England and Scotland Main Lines. They were also used in Scotland by the Scottish Region on the Glasgow and South Western Railway and at Hexham in Northumberland. They ceased to be built in 1968 due to a lack of funds for the maintenance of a fleet of what became known as '3030s'. This led to the withdrawal of the train soon after its introduction, with the introduction of the Class 303. Service The standard British Railways diesel shunter of the 1950s was the Class 303, which first appeared in British Railways service in 1956. They were built by English Electric at their Darlington works, which formed part of British Railways' Derby diesel shunter subsidiary of English Electric. Their first example, VV75, started operating on the East Coast Main Line in June 1956. The locomotive is commonly known as the British Railways diesel shunter or 3030. They were an improvement on the previous British Railways design of Class 304, the British Rail Class 3030. Their high power enabled them to be used for low line work. They had a characteristic orange and cream livery and were often seen huffing and puffing alongside a passenger train along the East Coast Main Line. British Railways bought 11 locomotives at a cost of £127,830. The ČD 303 has a 32-cwt magneto rail and a 3700 hp five-cylinder diesel. It has front and rear air-damped 6d1f23a050
