Although studies have confirmed that tomato and tomato products can reduce iron and vitamin C losses in the human body, to date there are no published data about their impact on zinc status. In this study, a group of 60 healthy females aged 19 to 45 years were randomly divided into three groups of 20, each to consume 4 kg of fresh tomatoes (group TT), 2 kg of freeze-dried tomatoes (group FD) or 2 kg of tomato powder in capsules (group PT) for 3 months. Daily food intakes were determined at baseline and during treatment. Plasma levels of iron, vitamin C, zinc and aluminium were measured by colorimetry before and after tomato consumption, and the impact of tomato intake on these elements was evaluated by ANOVA and the Scheffe test. The three groups of tomato-fed females, in order of decreasing tomato intake, exhibited positive effects on zinc body status. This effect was particularly apparent in the group that ingested tomato powder, followed by that fed freeze-dried tomatoes. The current study showed that tomato intake in the range of 4-5 kg/d is associated with a positive effect on zinc status.
