Grohl had one of the biggest jobs of the week to take up. He was there at precisely 4:30 p.m. on Feb. 7, 1995, to practice with his new kit, Hole. Meanwhile, Nirvana had the most difficult set of the day at 4:45 p.m. The quartet had to sing and jam through complete, take-no-prisoners versions of "Beat It" and "Scentsless Apprentice" , often against the backdrop of the whirling Fairway Cafe chair. The musicians had to agree on which songs they would play and how they would layer them. It was okay to come to an agreement, but Hole was way more intuitive and better at communication than Nirvana. Grohl was trying to teach them his signature songwriting technique from back in the early '80s, which was something he later dubbed the $20 Economy . ' Whenever Grohl offered his theory of 'Economy,' the players would be like, Oh, thats a great idea, can you elaborate. We didn't really get it. It was a process of figuring out a way to learn how to write songs that was economical in the way that I meant.' Courtney remembers. It was clear that the process was teaching the players how to develop songs from scratch, and Grohl was able to identify what needed to be improved from one take to the next. It wasn't always perfect and perfect takes, but Grohl had a great eye for what he wanted and what needed to be tweaked. He never really stopped working on a song, and in the case of "Smells Like Teen Spirit" , which he wrote on the spot, he got lucky and had the perfect song to help with his growing technique. The tunes that Grohl plays acoustic in the '80s songs were fairly basic; they were just chords on their own, but when he'd play them with the band, they became songs. So when he came out of the Fairway Cafe chair with the four of them behind him, they weren't just songs, they were songs you could play on acoustic guitars. He told them to try it without him and that if they did well, you would be the lead. The song became their biggest hit with Nirvana, and the crowd responded by singing along, but not to the tune of the original version, which Courtney can remember as sounding so simple, like a 12-bar blues.
