A study of bronchodilators for chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. This review presents a summary of new treatments for patients with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). There are currently four classes of bronchodilators in use: the beta-2 adrenergic agonists (LABAs), the anticholinergics, the mucolytics, and the phosphodiesterase (PDE) inhibitors. Several studies have shown that patients with COPD experience greater bronchodilator responses to short-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonists (LABAs), such as salmeterol and salbutamol, than to long-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonists (LABAs). The combination of a short-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonist and an anticholinergic is associated with more effective bronchodilation than the use of a short-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonist alone. This combination therapy has been used to treat patients with COPD who experience persistent symptoms. One randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled trial showed that the combination of a short-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonist and an anticholinergic was more effective than the combination of placebo and the anticholinergic in improving lung function in patients with COPD. The combination of a short-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonist and an anticholinergic can be considered as an add-on therapy for patients with COPD who experience persistent symptoms. Although no study has compared the combination of a short-acting beta-2 adrenergic agonist and an ant
